not require an entire overhaul of daily routine, but rather implementing small changes like turning off your lights, using less water, or eating a vegan or vegetarian diet - all of which can decrease a person's carbon footprint dramatically.

The 2014 Earth Days celebration in Vermillion sparked the creation of the non-profit organization Greening Vermillion.

"After Earth Days last year, there was an idea that there are a lot of people interested in sustainability, so we started a non-profit," says Jarchow. "The goal has been to engage with Vermillion at-large to help people do the work they were already doing, as well as promote campaigns related to sustainability within the community."

The groundwork for Greening Vermillion is just now being set in place. Currently, the organization is working on launching a "bring your bag" campaign which encourages community members to lessen their use of plastic and paper bags when shopping. The organization also hopes to tackle poverty issues in Vermillion.

"We have to ask ourselves what kind of world we want and how do we effect change to get there," says Jarchow. "There are people who don't have their needs met, and those whose lives need improving."

A central idea behind sustainability, says Professor of Sustainability Meghan Jarchow, is interconnectedness.

"There are many arms of sustainability," says Jarchow. "Environmental conservation, economic sustainability, and social justice - we have to think about how we conserve but also think about how people are treated, which is the less well-known but important aspect of sustainability."

This interconnectedness is exemplified in the very nature of Earth Days in Vermillion. The events of the week of April 20-25 bring together students, faculty and community members with a vested interest in promoting sustainability and environmental awareness.

You can find a schedule of events on the Greening Vermillion website, as well as other information regarding the non-profit.
