precipitation is concerned, there is no strong above or below (the normal indication)."

The region will remember the recent Thanksgiving weekend as ending with the "big dig" and "big melt" of snow, along with high winds and poor visibility.

However, Thanksgiving weekend storms aren't unusual, Today said.

"From a personal standpoint, I twice got days off going to Iowa State when large systems came at the end of Thanksgiving break," he said. "They cancelled (classes) so people didn't have to go back (to school) through the storm."

The holiday also marked the arrival of a historic weather event 10 years ago, Today said.

"The big ice storm in 2005 was also at the end of Thanksgiving weekend," he said, noting the storm that paralyzed portions of the region for up to two weeks.

That type of weather doesn't appear on the horizon in the coming week. And while winter doesn't officially start until Dec. 21, its arrival brings one bright spot - the days start getting longer.
