"They are also required to explain their interest in local government and participating in the academy," McQuillen said.

The program is open only to citizens over the age of 18.

"We only have the age requirement because they might do a police ride-along among the other things they'll be doing," City Manager John Prescott explained at the Feb. 6 city council meeting.

Initially, the academy was set to begin Feb. 21, but the city had not received enough applications by that time, McQuillen said.

"We'd like to cap it around 10 (participants)," he said. "There are generally quite a few people who are really interested in learning more about the city.

They might come because they've had interaction with the city, or maybe they're studying government and administration at the university."

The course has been held twice in the past, the most recent time being in 2010, McQuillen said.

"It's usually something that the interns head," he said. "It kind of depends on their schedules."

"We found the first two sessions we had to be a pretty favorable program," Prescott said at the city council meeting.

"People enjoyed the opportunity to learn more about their city."

McQuillen said participants will receive a number of benefits from taking the course, including "the sense of being informed about what their city does so they can have a better understanding of what goes on at city hall. It should be a good class."

The application deadline is March 9.

Champions for Children will be honored at events in Sioux Falls (April 27) and Rapid City (May 11).
