gorgeous our instruments would look in one of their publications?
 "So, it was a no-brainer for us to try to get them here," he said.
 To encourage DK's visit, the reps from the NMM made sure the publisher knew the museum could be a "one-stop shopping" opportunity for their photographers.
 "Rather than just these dozen or so instruments that they asked about, we could easily provide basically everything they needed, and they could just stop looking," Johnson said. "I got the sense that they were looking at different museums and institutions to find the things they needed."
 Three photographers arrived from the UK early this month and stayed for the next seven days, taking pictures of everything they could.
 Although their schedule was too packed for them to comment, Johnson said the process of photographing items in the NMM's collection was going well.
 "They're pretty much working around the clock," he said last week. "They start before we open, and they continue into the evening hours. I'm not around when they finally finish."
 The photographs were taken with the assistance of two NMM staff members.
 "(The photographers) came with a list that had been worked out in advance with our staff," Johnson said. "They had been combing through our Web site, which has a lot of our stuff in it, but by no means anywhere near all of it."
 "So, once they're here in the facility, other things catch their eyes," he said. "They keep finding things they're interested in."
 The instruments were photographed surrounded by a white background in the lower level of the museum.
 "What you end up with is just the instrument (in the picture)," Johnson said. "Instruments are not easy to photograph because obviously, you need to avoid reflections, you need the detail that really shows them off to their best."
 Johnson said he does not know the exact publication date, but guesses the book could hit the shelves - including those at the NMM itself - by the end of the year.
 "I know based on their reputation it's going to be a gorgeous book," he said. "There's no doubt about that. I really can't wait to see it."
