A little regular maintenance can help improve the life span of your furnishings - polish the wood, vacuum the cushions, treat the leather, or find out how to make minor repairs. Be familiar with what the manufacturer's warranty covers, and look into any protection plans your furniture retailer has to offer.

What if you don't need furniture that will last a lifetime? If a lesser-quality piece will do to get your kid through college, there are plenty of options that will look good and serve their function. If you're furnishing a room that won't be used very often (like a guest room), it's fair to sacrifice a little sturdiness. Buying quality furniture might mean spending extra money at first, but break the price down over its many years of use and it will probably be a greater savings than regularly replacing lesser quality furniture.
