The first week of classes saw approximately 50 students in attendance each day, with an average of 35 for the second, Heggestad said.

The kids are great," she said. 'We have some really hardcore kids that come back every year - some that like to come both weeks, even though they do similar activities both weeks. ... Many of the kids really enjoy art camp because it's not like the other activities that are offered to them.

"We have a great variety of sporting activities - which are great for kids, for sure – but there's always that group of kids that need a little more of a creative outlet and a different kind of structure. This has been a good fit for a good number of families," she said.

The instructors say they're getting as much out of the experience as their students.

"I've never taught at an art camp before, so I was a little hesitant," said assistant painting instructor Dru Daniels. "But the kids really seem to like it. It's interesting to see what they get into, because sometimes the thing you think they won't like, they love, and the thing you think they'll love, they don't."

Although she has helped out in other year's this is Michele Mechling's second year volunteering with the camp as a full instructor. While she headed the painting class before, she taught sculpture this summer.

"It's easier in that you kind of know the schedule and the way it flows, but as far as lessons are concerned we came up with all new lessons this year," she said. "Since we're not using a kiln to fire clay this year, we came up with other new projects in a lot more media.

"Painting was a little easier because 2D you can control a little more than 3D," she said.

"There's always the chance of failure or something breaking off," Dahlseid added.

This is Dahlseid's first year with the camp.

"It's an adventure," he said. "It's hectic, but it's fun to see when the kids get into the projects. I like that. It's fun to see when it clicks."

The Messy Hands Art Camp is sponsored by the Vermillion Area Arts Council, with assistance from a grant from the South Dakota Arts Council, as well as help from the United Way, the city of Vermillion, the Vermillion Civic Council and private donors.
