Meet David Hulac

By David Lias david.lias@plaintalk.net

A familiar face will be seen among dozens of characters at the Vermillion High School Performing Arts Center when "Robin Hood: Spirit of Greene" is presented for a four-day run on July 19.

David Hulac may not predominately take center stage during this year's Vermillion Community Theatre (VCT) production, but providing a supporting role is something he's more than familiar with.

In the VCT's 2012 production of "Annie," David portrayed Oliver "Daddy" Warbucks, going so far as shaving his head to better resemble the character.

In "My Fair Lady," presented in 2011, he played Professor Henry Higgins, the phoneticist who takes on the task of completing a vast makeover of Eliza Doolittle's speech, manners and dress.

In 2010, David took on the supporting character of Jud Fry in the musical "Oklahoma!"

This week, he portrays "the bad guy" he said, not the lead role in "Robin Hood: Spirit of Greene."

"I'm the one who decides that everyone needs new taxes, and I'm the one who decides that Robin Hood needs to be arrested," David said.

He believes his attraction to the stage can be traced back to when he was a 7-year-old, and saw two productions in his church - "Godspell," and "MASS" by Leonard Bernstein. "That experience really captured by imagination. I didn't realize how much fun they could be, but just watching those was so amazing," he said. "One of the things about being a little kid is you're able to remember everybody's parts and everybody's songs, and you get so involved in the story. And, that's really never gone away. "Theatre brings together lots of fun things together for me," David said. "It's really challenging to remember your lines, remember your blocking. It's fun to make new relationships all the time. I'm never very good with choreography, but for me it's fun to try to remember how my feet go and how to work with other people, and those sorts of things."

David remembers feeling devastated after the last performance of "My Fair Lady" in 2011. "I couldn't figure out why, but I later read something in a meditation that when a show's run ends, it is like a death, because all of these people, all of these parts that were working to create this one artifact, this one show, are gone," he said. "When our bodies die, our molecules are still there, but they sort of go off to create something else, and you can never bring them back together to create that one thing."

"The soul may be gone, but being part of creating that thing that is bigger than all of us together, creating that synergy, is magical. And now, my daughter plays Marian," David said, pointing to the stage during rehearsal, "and my other two kids are apothecary kids, and it's fun to have the whole family be a part of it, and to watch it all happening again."

David, a professor of psychology at the University of South Dakota, is used to lecturing before classrooms of students, and believes theatre performance is just another way of communicating to large groups of people. "But I almost wonder ... I would do this show if there was an audience of two, because it's so fun for me," he said. "Now, we get a lot of energy from the audience, and every audience is different, and that creates a different artifact every night."

"But this really is a different way of communicating a truth that I can't do when I lecture, that I can't do when I write - those are very worthwhile and fun things to do, also, but I really think theatre helps you communicate that sense of truth."
