Public Power: Reliable in Good Times and Bad. It's nice to know that at least one local business has survived the recession without letting prices get out of control. Your public power system has managed to keep its rates lower than other utilities even during these tough economic times. That's because your not-for-profit utility is operated by the local government as a public service, so its focus is on serving the needs of its consumers, and not on sending profits to stockholders. In fact, the mission of any public power system is to reliably provide electricity at a reasonable cost. The result: lower costs, lower rates and continued reliable service, in good times and bad.
