certainly gives us the opportunity to interview these people on the radio," Fuller said. "Our stations and the Broadcaster Press and Plain Talk will also be able to help each other by sharing information and being a source for one another because we understand the value of local. That is important to readers and the listeners, and therefore that benefits local advertisers."

The radio stations' new presence in downtown Vermillion "gives an opportunity for our valued clients to be able to produce their commercials here without having to travel, and we'll have a lot of prize giveaways that we can have at the studio here," Fuller said. "There will be a lot of changes over this next year as we continue to grow and establish this new physical place."

"The purpose of this, besides being here physically, is to be able to broadcast from Vermillion in conjunction with our Yankton studios, and we're going to have Joe Van Goor doing a feature with Randy Hammer most weekday mornings," he said. "There will be different individuals who will join Joe and we'll have an extra Vermillion spotlight on our station."

Both Wood and Fuller emphasized the collaborative effort involving their businesses will focus entirely on providing the utmost in local service to the community's advertisers, readers and listeners.

Fuller noted that the Vermillion Now! Initiative, which has proven to be quite successful in helping the community reach its economic development goals, serves as a good example of how collaborative efforts can be successful.

"We have been a Gold level partner with the Vermillion Now! campaign. Local is very important. Vermillion Now! is a campaign dedicated to growing local, and anything we can do to help that, we're going to try to do," Fuller said. "We want to have an open invite to help the Vermillion community. We are a public servant, a public trustee and we're going to use the Vermillion studio in that role."

Both Wood and Fuller noted that their print and broadcast businesses are not competitors.

"We're really in the same fight together," Fuller said. "When you think of the Vermillion Now! campaign, the purpose of that is to grow commerce in Vermillion, to increase the tax base and therefore decrease the tax burden on each individual person. We're really in this fight together; we all want to play in the sandbox together, and we all want the same result."

"There are going to be a lot of things in the future that we're going to be partnering on," he added. "We've had a lot of exciting discussions, and there are going to be a lot of things coming. It's going to be a multi-platformed approach, and there's going to be a lot of fun things ahead. I'm really excited about what's about to come next."

"This is really an extraordinary opportunity to partner so that advertisers have the chance to get that shared media mix," Wood said.
