Vermillion teen drowns in attempt to save sibling

The body of a Vermillion teenager who disappeared in the icy waters of the Big Sioux River on March 14 was recovered by rescue workers the next day.

Madison Wallace, 16, apparently drowned after she entered the river to save her little brother, Garrett Wallace, 6, also of Vermillion, after he entered the water. The incident happened at Falls Park in Sioux Falls, in a stretch of river below the falls.

A bystander, Lyle Eagletail, 28, of Sioux Falls, also plunged into the river March 14 to help the two siblings. Crews removed his body from the river on March 16.

Garrett Wallace was eventually able to exit the river shortly after the incident occurred. Despite numerous eyewitness accounts, it is still unclear whether Madison Wallace, Eagletail, or both played a role in saving him.

"We do have some sad news," Sioux Falls Fire Chief Jim Sideras told reporters early Friday afternoon, March 15. "We did find the young girl who went in after her brother. We found her in an area we where we thought it would be best to look for her."

The teen's body was recovered near a man-made dam located about a block downstream from the falls.

"She's been removed, her family has been notified," Sideras said, "and she's been taken to one of the local hospitals."

"I talked with the father, and the mother (at the time) was going back home (to Vermillion). She's now returning back to Sioux Falls," he said. "They are still in a state of shock. Our prayers are with them, and we're just trying to help them cope the best that we can."

Sioux Falls has made their fire chaplains available to the Wallace family, he said. "It's going to be a long, slow process for them."

Crews used backhoes Friday to remove ice from the river. The equipment remained busy through the day as the search for Eagletail continued.

"We're still looking for the young man," Sideras said March 15. "We still have some issues with the water. We still have ice to move out. We hope this will go fairly quick; we just don't know time wise because of the conditions that we have going on in the water."

Falls Park, a city tourist attraction where people often picnic and wedding pictures are taken, remained closed to the public on March 15.

"We don't want the public down here yet, because we still have a lot of trucks here," he said. "We anticipate that we could be here another 12 hours. We just don't know at this time. We're still maintaining a dive team from Minnehaha County."

Sioux Falls and Minnehaha County law enforcement and rescue personnel quickly responded March 14 and began searching the river for Wallace and Eagletail. They were initially hampered at that time by heavy flows in the river.

"We had so much water flowing last night," Sideras said. "We were able to shut off the water so it's not as bad as it was last night. Last night, the water was higher, and that created an area for someone to be moved quite a distance. Especially when it (the river) narrows in and funnels – it will push a body quite a bit farther along."

Other challenges to searchers include debris in the water and undertows. The frothing water below the falls also created a thick layer of foam that Thursday night, March 14, was 10 feet deep in places and hampered search efforts.

"It was also very cold and icy, and the granite is very slippery when it is wet," Sideras said, "so we're just not sure what caused the boy to fall into the water."

As heavy equipment removed ice from the river channel, divers wearing special gear to protect them from the cold entered the water.

"The divers are going in zero visibility water," the fire chief said. "You can't see your hand in front of your face. It's all by feel, so it's a very slow process. There's a lot of debris in the water that's going to slow up their process, too. They couldn't go in with the ice for a lot of reasons. The ice and the water moving creates a lot of problems, but they were able to go in today."

Divers could encounter everything from tree limbs to re-bar when they enter the river's channel.

"There's things from 20 or 30 years ago – when you look this area, and how there's been construction here, there could

Mourners celebrate the gift of Madison

Holding back sobs, but with a firm voice, Anna Cable thanked God for the gift of Madison Wallace as she presented the invocation at the Vermillion teen's funeral service Tuesday night, March 19.

"Thank you for the many blessings ... and for the honor and privilege of brushing lives with this remarkable young woman," Cable said in her prayer that began the night's services at the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints in Vermillion.

Madison, 16, drowned in the Big Sioux River Thursday, March 14, as she attempted to rescue her younger brother, Garrett, after he slipped into the icy water during a family outing to Falls Park in Sioux Falls.

A bystander, Lyle Eagletail, 28, of Sioux Falls, also entered the river Thursday evening, March 14, to help the two siblings, and lost his life in the river. Crews recovered Madison's body Friday afternoon, March 15, and located Eagletail's body in the churning river Saturday, March 16.

The crowded church, filled with the young woman's friends, family and fellow community members, learned how she often thought of others rather than herself, and that a disability made her more determined to work hard and be curious.

Margaret Knaphus, Wallace's grandmother, read a life sketch describing her granddaughter's character and personality. Madison was described as a "gifter."

"She showed her love by sharing her friendship, and with homemade gifts," Knaphus said. "There were eight in the family, so she was always busy."

She loved to crochet, to make hair clips and homemade greeting cards. Madison also mastered origami, Knaphus said, and with her zest for life, loved to go bike riding, rollerblading and rock climbing.

During a family visit to Cascade Park near Orem, UT, "Madison loved to climb tall trees quite often and watch her family try to find her," Knaphus said, causing laughter to roll through the church.

"She would often call her brother, Corbyn, over and tell him she had a secret to share," Knaphus said, reading text prepared by Madison's mother, Lara. "She would whisper in his ear, 'I love you.'"

"Madison wanted to make it clear that she loved us," her grandmother said, "by telling us often and by showing us whenever she could."

She underwent therapy as a youngster to help improve her communication skills and cognitive ability.

"She wanted so much to do well in school," Knaphus said. "Her teachers always commented on her work ethic. Madison just gave her all to everything she does. She loved her teachers in Vermillion."

Her school activities included playing the French horn in the high school band.

"She loved being in the (Vermillion High School) marching band. She loved

Wacipi keeps tradition alive

Sunday evening, the drums became silent and dancers left the floor of the DakotaDome as the 41st annual USD Wacipi, held March 16-17, came to a close.

Presented by the Tiospaye Student Council, the Wacipi is a powwow featuring Native dancers, drummers as well as Tiospaye competitions, including Miss, Junior Miss and Little Miss USD Tiospaye.

Warren Peterson, a USD student from Lower Brule who currently serves as the Tiospaye Student Council president, said planning that began last year by past council members helped make this year's event a success.

"The executive who took this powwow will start the planning work for the next one, and then the next exec will finish the planning of it," Peterson said.

In other words, he was ultimately in charge of last weekend's festivities.

"Things went as well as planned, and it wouldn't have been as successful if wasn't for the previous execs laying down the groundwork to make it the event that it is," Peterson said. "They made it big, and everybody was waiting for it to happen."

"I think we've had more vendors than we've ever had this year, and a lot of people thought we had more people participating this year, as well," he said.

The theme of last weekend's Wacipi was "Rising Above – Expectations for Generations."

The 41st annual Wacipi is part of the 2013 "Realizing the Dream" Native Weekend at the University of South Dakota. Additional activities scheduled include the "We Stand Together" Diversity Symposium, the Native American Alumni Banquet, the 16th annual Building Bridges Conference and Native American Weekend Visit for High School Students.

Wacipi participants and planners are grateful to have the use of the DakotaDome last weekend.

"The Dome is definitely the best option," Peterson said.

The Wacipi was open to anyone who wished to attend. Those not familiar with the customs of a powwow soon noticed different styles of dance taking place on the wooden basketball floor of the DakotaDome.

The men's traditional dance symbolizes a battle or the story of a hunt. The men's grass dance is said to have come from the past, when dancers were sent in first to stomp down long grass to make a clearing for the other dancers during a powwow.

Men's fancy dancing became a traditional part of Wacipis in the late 1900s. Boys and young men, who wear brilliantly colored bustles and dance regalia, prefer this style.

The women's traditional dance is simple in appearance, but plays a very important symbolic role. The dancers move their feet to the beat of the drum to represent the heartbeat of mother earth, to heal the world.

Many of the women and young girls wore jingle dresses. The small jingles that adorn their clothing, made of

Michels: Vermillion is community of compassion

By David Lias

Lieutenant Gov. Matt Michels told a bit of his life story while addressing the annual banquet of the Vermillion Chamber of Commerce and Development Company.

The Vermillion community, he said, is richly woven throughout his family's history.

Addressing a capacity audience in The Eagles Thursday night, March 14, he talked of his grandfather, who originally tried, and failed at being in cobbler in Vermillion. He later found success as a businessman in the community.

"Their whole world was centered around commerce, and the destination of this community was commerce," he said, speaking of his grandfather, and his great-uncle, who also was involved in the Vermillion community a couple generations ago.

Michels' grandfather attended the University of South Dakota, and the lieutenant governor brought his 1925 USD yearbook, "The Coyote," to the banquet.

showing the ads that appeared nearly 90 years ago. It was a light-hearted exercise that punctuated by Michels' amusing reading of the ads that brought back memories of businesses that no longer exist, and served as a reminder that several of the community's establishments have existed for a long time.

Michels found ads for:

- The Coyote Theatre – "the theatre of quality, showing the best of Paramount and First National Pictures, and leading, legitimate plays."
- The Coyote Barbershop, described as "the world's best barbershop."
- The Plain Talk – "Printing pleases

"It was interesting as I looked through this," he said. "One way this yearbook was paid for was through advertising."

He flipped through the back pages of the yearbook, particular people. Promptly executed."

- The First National Bank – "Capital & Surplus ... $100,000."
- "And one of my personal favorites – Sanitary Barbershop and Billiard Parlor," Michels said, flipping through the yearbook. "That's because the world's best barbershop was already taken."

The Vermillion community also promoted itself in the 1925 yearbook with this advertisement: "Vermillion, South Dakota. State, University, City. Vermillion can and will meet your requirements for it is an ideal city of home and education. Vermillion is progressive, beautiful, modern and the county seat of Clay County. Clay County is a rich agricultural county, and except for the lands around the river, it is a level prairie where hundreds of beautiful farms are found. Corn is king. Diversified farming has long been the rule here. Crop failure has never been known. Vermillion has always realized its responsibility to the people of South Dakota by establishing
