practices, said there is great value to having the medical students on campus.

"It is such an advantage getting to know them and build relationships with them," she said. "At the same time, they get to know the community as a whole. So, it is great that we get to have them here. For us, it is a great recruitment tool: We get to know them early on and build a relationship with them and it makes it so much of an easier transition when they do decide to locate here because they know what to expect coming to us."

Youmans said she would love to have all of the students return to Yankton once their residencies are finished, but realistically that is not possible.

"Recruitment goes on what our needs are, as well," she said. "We may want all of them but not have the need for them. But, it is nice to be able to plan out and say, three years from now, we are going to need a family practice physician or we need another surgeon. If there is a physician that is getting toward the end of their career we can plan for that."

Youmans also said that the relationships built between local medical providers and the medical students are an advantage to the students and the community.

"I don't know all the relationships that they have built with our providers in the area. But I do check in with the students, and they all have wonderful things to say about our physicians in the Yankton medical family," she said. "So, I am sure there are great ties and relationships that have been built. It is immeasurable to those students to have that. There have been so many that have been on our campus, gone on to do their residency and then come back to Yankton. I am not sure what the numbers are but there have been quite a few that have."

She noted that there is a strong Yankton High School connection in the USD medical school, as well.

"I think there are five or six Yankton High School graduates that are doing their medical school right here in Yankton," she said. "That says a lot about our schools and what they are producing and putting out, as well as the expectations they have."
